One spring morning, early in the month of March, 1747, eight years before the French and Indian war, two young men might have been seen standing at the gates of Old Belvoir the elegant home of the Hon. Wm. Fairfax on the Virginia shore of the Potomac river, two miles below Mount Vernon, which latter place was then the residence of Major Lawrence Washington, son of Augustine, and half brother of George Washington of ever honored memory, not yet sixteen years of age, though already nearly of manly stature and possessing much of manly bearing and dignity. The other was George. William Fairfax, son of the Belvoir proprietor, and older by eight years than his companion. The former after having completed his...
